Groom—A Novel Entertainment.

One of the indispensable adjuncts to a wedding is the groom. It is positively necessary that he should be present, and yet, what little attention he receives. If he has a handsome face, it is admired by the susceptible maiden, and sometimes by the married woman, whose fortune is made, but aside from that, what is he to his customers except a handsome man? It is ever announced that his visit is delectable in front or his coat on train in the back! Is his elaborate boutonniere—the most beautiful rosebud the conservatory could produce—the subject of remark? Are his accomplishments enumerated and complimented? Is he ever said to be "a great favorite in church, literary, musical or social circles?" The time-honored fattery, "that what is our loss is another city's gain," cannot be paid to him, for he does not change his residence as his bride may, he camps down in some place and stays there, and after the marriage takes his bride there also. He is spoken of as a "rising" young lawyer, but he is past forty, and no matter how true it may be that he is rising, and it is very commendable in him, the oft repeated phrase is distasteful to him. So altogether the groom does not receive the proper amount of attention that he should, and something ought to be done about it. The occasion, no doubt, is quite as momentous to him as to the bride. It is his life, it is his shame that such slight notice should be bestowed upon him. His elaborate boutonniere is not just for the inspection of friends. He does not have a tailor come to the house and sew, and sew, and sew for weeks and weeks to order that he should have all the latest fashions for a matrimonial career. Even a new dress suit is not always purchased for the groom. He does not have a tailor come to the house and sew, and sew, and sew for weeks and weeks to order that he should have all the latest fashions for a matrimonial career. Even a new dress suit is not always purchased for the groom.

The paper wedding anniversary which was celebrated on Friday evening by Mr. and Mrs. Baker for their son, Mr. Lawrence Baker and wife, was something new in the way of entertainments, and was unique. The first anniversary of married life is called the paper wedding. Why, has not been determined, but so it is. The invitations are made out on everything else. A circular sheet of paper, printed on the edge, was used; in the center the invitation was printed. About one inch from the edge was a row of perforations, and a narrow white ribbon was run in. These were then rolled up and tied with the ribbon. The decorations were flags and white paper roses by the hundred, and were used everywhere, a design being a large white completely covered with roses. The appointments, as far as the bride and groom were concerned, were round and white. In the dining-room were tissue-paper napkins, and all the refreshments were white, and without exception, the more the better. The occasion was enjoyable, and the guests were highly delighted with the pleasure conferred.

There is some talk of establishing a club on the plan of the old Impromptu, which flourished here some twelve years ago. The club was divided into two sections, and entertained alternately every two weeks. The programme consisted of tableaux, plays, operettas, musicals, illustrated poems, prose or incidents, songs illustrated with tableaux, readings, recitations, comedies, burlesques, and in fact anything that the fertile mind of the leaders or members could suggest from Shakespeare to Mother Goose; and in the minds of the old members the entertainments given by the Impromptu loomed as among the pleasantest of recollections. It is a long time since the club has been in existence here with any object in view other than literary pursuits, and cards, and there is no doubt but what, if it were properly managed, a new organization would be as great a success as the mentioned club.
